Europe has got off to a flying start in 2025, driven by a combination of attractive valuations, robust corporate earnings and a clearer European Central Bank (ECB) policy outlook. With European stocks trading at significant discounts relative to their US counterparts—often at record-low forward price-to-earnings (P/E) ratios—investors have increasingly turned to Europe for opportunities. This 'catch-up rally' is further bolstered by robust performance in key sectors like financials, consumer goods, and industrials, which have not only delivered steady earnings growth but also provided attractive dividend yields.

Geopolitical catalyst

A deeper dive into the rally reveals several additional catalysts that could sustain the momentum throughout the year. One of the most compelling is the possibility of a resolution to the Russia-Ukraine conflict. Should diplomatic breakthroughs emerge, European markets could benefit from a reduction in geopolitical risk and improved energy supply dynamics. Lower commodity prices and easing inflationary pressures would support earnings across energy-intensive sectors.

Debt brake relief: Germany's potential loosening opens doors for increased public investment

Another significant catalyst lies in the realm of fiscal policy, specifically the potential loosening of Germany's debt brake following the upcoming elections. Polls suggest that a coalition government—most likely led by the CDU/CSU and SPD¹—will emerge, with a greater willingness to relax rigid fiscal constraints. Proposals under discussion include reclassifying certain government subsidies as “financial transactions” and increasing the permitted structural deficit. These measures could unlock much-needed public investment, fuelling economic growth and corporate earnings. Although any major amendment to the debt brake would require a two-thirds majority in both the Bundestag and Bundesrat, current polls indicate that such a scenario is increasingly plausible.

Exporter advantage from tariff under-pricing

Adding another layer to the rally is the under-pricing of tariff risks, which has given European exporters a distinctive edge in domestic markets. By not fully pricing in the potential impact of US tariffs on European goods, these exporters have been able to maintain competitive pricing and expand market share. The underperformance of the Euro versus the dollar has made European exporters that much cheaper. This underpricing has been a critical factor behind the stellar performance of many export-oriented sectors, as it helps offset cost pressures and drive revenue growth. Exporters have been able to leverage this pricing advantage, further boosting the overall performance of European equities in 2025.

The WisdomTree Europe Equity UCITS ETF \(HEDF\) invests in dividend paying Eurozone companies that derive more than 50% of their revenue outside Europe. In doing so, the WisdomTree Europe Equity UCITS ETF \(HEDF\) attributes a higher weighting to sectors that exhibit stronger earnings growth, such as consumer discretionary, industrials, financials and information technology, while it has a lower weighting to sectors with weaker earnings growth, like energy, utilities, and real estate. The WisdomTree Europe Equity UCITS ETF \(HEDF\) tracks the price and yield performance of the WisdomTree Europe Equity UCITS Index. The return attribution of the underlying index across sectors over the prior month is highlighted below:

The connection between stronger earnings and performance is evident from the performance of the WisdomTree Europe Equity UCITS ETF \(HEDF\) in 2025. While the EuroStoxx 600 Index is up 8.8% and the MSCI Europe Index is up 9.1%, the WisdomTree Europe Equity UCITS ETF \(HEDF\) is up 12.4% year-to-date in 2025. The return attribution of the underlying index highlights that the tilt to exporters has been the primary driver of returns.

Chinese stimulus impact

European exporters also stand to benefit from favourable policy initiatives coming from China. As outlined in a recent Politburo announcement on 09 December 2024, China is shifting from incremental support to full-on stimulus mode, with top priorities that include vigorously boosting consumption, improving investment efficiency, and expanding domestic demand³. This bold policy stance is expected to reinvigorate Chinese demand and help end disinflation, thereby providing additional tailwinds for European exporters who benefit from increased demand in China's vast market.

Conclusion

European equities are being propelled by attractive valuations, robust earnings, supportive monetary policy, and a series of strategic catalysts—from the potential end of the Russia-Ukraine conflict to a more flexible fiscal framework in Germany, along with the competitive boost provided by underpriced tariff risks. Together, these factors make a case for investors to consider European stocks, even as they remain vigilant to the inherent risks in a dynamic geopolitical and economic landscape. While the outlook remains largely positive, it is important for investors to remain mindful of potential risks. Geopolitical uncertainties, lingering trade tensions, and the uneven pace of economic recovery across European countries could all introduce volatility.
